Hafıza Merkezi (Hakikat Adalet ve Hafıza Çalışmaları Derneği, eng. Truth Justice Memory Center) was established with the aims of uncovering the truth concerning past human rights violations, strengthening the collective memory with regards to them, and supporting survivors in their pursuit of justice. It is an organization which believes that the prospect of sustainable peace and democracy is only possible through a just and recognition-based approach to victims of past human rights violations. The center espouses the ideal of a free and inclusive society, which values and embraces difference, acknowledges the state violence in its past as well as victims’ rights and individual freedoms, and has achieved effective civil control over repressive state apparatuses. It contributes to the development of mechanisms and tools for the creation of a peaceful and free society, which considers human rights to be its fundamental values.

Supporting Human Rights Defenders

Memory and Peace Studies

Legal Studies
In our previous two annual reports, the team at Hafıza Merkezi have been talking about the political transformation that has been unfolding in Turkey since 2015 and about our search for ways to respond to this transformation. Although our search, of course, continues, it is safe to say that 2019-2020 was a period in which our activities in this field began to get on track.

It may sound a little strange to say this in a time of uncertainty such as this, a time marked by an epidemic that is shaking the entire world and causing us great losses, pushing us into socially distanced lives and increasingly dystopian visions of the future. However, leaving aside the new lines of inquiry triggered by the epidemic for a moment, a look back over the past two years shows that both Hafıza Merkezi and the social opposition in general are, in the face of rising authoritarianism, better prepared and equipped than ever, and we have even made some promising achievements.

Yes, politics has continued to spill over and beyond the borders and boundaries of democratic institutions and norms over these last two years, and human rights institutions and actors such as us have certainly had our share of it. Anti-LGBTI+ hate speech has become institutionalized. The government made efforts to establish its own bar association. It was announced that Turkey was withdrawing from the Istanbul Convention by Presidential decree. In defiance of the spirit of law and justice, Osman Kavala’s imprisonment was continued despite his acquittal and related ECtHR rulings. Finally, hidden behind the excuse of preventing weapons of mass destruction, a law targeting the activities of civil society associations was enacted. Overall, we are therefore leaving behind a two-year stretch during which we have constantly been on the alert against these and many other adversities of a similar kind. As if such a political atmosphere in which the normalization of extraordinary developments has become a psychological necessity were not enough, the losses, challenges and radical changes brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic confronted us with brand new questions and problems.

And yet, these two years were also a period of exciting dynamics around the world and in Turkey. When the AKP-MHP coalition in Turkey lost several of the metropolitan cities, including Istanbul and Ankara, in the local elections, it was not only the political opposition but in fact the whole social opposition that won, finally able to taste the much-needed feelings of hope and optimism. We saw historic moments of mobilization against the state’s monopoly of violence in the Black Lives Matter movement in the US and the Yellow Vests in France. As the School Strikes for Climate movement, led by Greta Thunberg, mobilized over one million students from 125 countries in 2019, the demands around the issues of global warming and renewable energy technologies have become more mainstream than ever before. Remarkable examples of resistance have formed in Turkey in Mount Ida and İkizdere, where environmental disasters are in the making. Student protests, most markedly manifesting themselves at Boğaziçi University in Turkey, brought the good news that under the decaying order the new generation has already started creating a new order, one that is more vibrant and peaceful. Recalling the gift given to us by a group of Chilean women in the form of a protest dance that travelled the globe will perhaps help us feel a little better, as we realize that viruses do not have a monopoly on contagion. In the past two years, we have seen that society at large has not withdrawn into its shell and quailed in the face of oppression, intimidation and criminalization but that on the contrary, it has matured and strengthened its forms of opposition. In all of this we can see that the reflexes of the democratic opposition against the wave of authoritarianism in Turkey and across the world are growing stronger.

At Hafıza Merkezi, we too are rethinking our activities in order to respond to this shift in politics and the questions it entails. In earlier years, our focus was on proposing a framework to enable Turkey to confront its past, in particular through our documentation activities to uncover the truths behind enforced disappearances. As a result of lengthy discussions and strategy meetings, we decided to expand our focus to include peace studies and more recent rights violations in specific areas. Our current fields of work are i) memory and peace studies; ii) tackling impunity; iii) supporting human rights defenders and organizations; and iv) international cooperation and solidarity.

During the period covered by this report, we completed our project Defending Peace in Difficult Times, where we took stock of Turkey’s failed peace process. Although circumstances did not allow us to share its findings with the broader public, this project nevertheless provided us with the valuable opportunity to establish close relations with stakeholders working in the field of peace building as well as the knowledge base that would determine the form and content of new projects. Setting out precisely from these insights, we launched two new projects in the field of peace building. In the first of these, we aimed to create a peacebuilding community by bringing together young people working in civil society organizations in regular workshops and thus facilitating an interactive learning process. The aim of the second project is to expand the network of stakeholders in the field. To this end, we are planning to carry out research on issues whose negotiation is indispensable if we are to find a political solution to the Kurdish issue, and to organise encounters between civil society actors working in the field.

2019–2020 was also a period in which we undertook new ventures in the field of memory studies. In May 2019, we organized the exhibition Public Secret (Aşikâr Sır) as part of the International Week of the Disappeared. During the preparations for this exhibition, we used creative narrative forms to illustrate the archival knowledge we have built up through our database on enforced disappearances. Moreover, we expanded the scope of the memorializeturkey.com website, originally launched in 2013 as a compilation of memorialization projects in Turkey.

Within the scope of our project Memory and Art, situated at the intersection of artistic expression and remembering, we organized a series of talks in which experts contemplated a collection of artworks assembled over the course of a two-year selection process. The 15 speakers who participated in these talks were from a variety of backgrounds—civil society, arts and academia—making it a truly interdisciplinary series. The keen interest in these talks, reflected by the large audience numbers attending each of the sessions, provided us with great motivation to continue working at the intersection of different disciplines.

While a number of lawsuits on past human rights violations ended with impunity for the perpetrators, we continued to follow the remaining ongoing trials. We also took the time to take stock of the entire process, and as a result of this, during Human Rights Week (10–17 December 2019), we published an infographic to inform the public about the problematic aspects of the trials within the 12 lawsuits we monitor (see failibelli.org). Furthermore, we contributed to the ECHR’s supervision of Turkey regarding the violations in question by submitting detailed monitoring reports to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe.

With our long-held hope of being able to confront past violations through criminal proceedings reaching a dead end, we tried to expand the framework of academic debates in this area and broaden the network of stakeholders. In line with this aim, we organized a symposium entitled Transitional Justice in Turkey: Transforming Subjects, Methods and Tools, at which 16 researchers from different disciplines had the opportunity to share their research with the public.

The most important development for us during this period came with the launch of our Haklara Destek (Support to Rights) grant program, which aims to support rights-based civil society organizations. So far, 48 organizations working with a rights-based approach have been provided with institutional grants and offered a comprehensive capacity building program within the scope of the Haklara Destek program, which is financed by the EU Delegation to Turkey and run by Hafıza Merkezi and the Heinrich Böll Stiftung.

In the face of increasing pressure on rights defenders and the shrinking of civic spaces, we have largely consolidated our monitoring and reporting efforts geared towards bolstering resistance against these developments. As of the end of 2020, we have created and published informative profiles about 50 rights defenders on sessizkalma.org, our online monitoring and resource platform concerning rights defenders at risk, which we created in partnership with the Association for Monitoring Equal Rights and with the support of the Netherlands Helsinki Committee. These activities were accompanied by the panel series Shrinking Democratic Space and International Solidarity, which gave us the opportunity to compare Turkey with Poland, Pakistan and Brazil in terms of issues such as digital rights, LGBTI+ rights and urban participation.

In this past period, we also brought together rights-based actors and professionals from the creative disciplines through joint projects with the aim of strengthening the ties between them. With the video series #DarAlan (Shrinking Space), made up of images shot and collected by Fatih Pınar at various demonstrations, press releases, demonstrations and rallies, we created a visual record of the recent shrinking of Turkey’s civic spaces. Meanwhile, our search for innovative ways of communicating has led us to engage with the approach of hope-based communication, which gives greater space to emotions and values.

So much for the past two years. Now, our plan for the upcoming period is to develop our activities in line with the following four strategic goals: i) strengthening our strategic research and analysis capacity, ii) expanding our network of stakeholders, iii) further integrating a gender perspective into our work, and iv) increasing our international reach and cooperation.

However, no matter how much we try to frame and re-frame our work, as already stated in the beginning, our search will never end. Considering the long-term ecological, geopolitical, technological and demographic upheavals that the world is going through, as well as the pressures exerted on the field of human rights by the shifts and changes in global politics, it is obvious that for the time being, awareness of the future will continue to determine the zeitgeist.

In today’s times, expectations regarding the world’s future tend to be quite pessimistic. Of course, there is good reason for this pessimism. However, we prefer to view the future from a window where optimism and pessimism simply appear as two faces of the same reality rather than a dichotomy. In this, we might want to take to heart from the Chinese proverb quoted on an Amnesty International poster: “It is better to light a candle than curse the darkness.”

Kerem Çiftciöğlu
In February 2019, we organized a hackathon, in which 8 NGOs and 18 people working in the creative sector participated. During the two-day event, creative teams and rights defenders worked together to develop an institution-specific communication project for each institution. This collaboration also continued in the following months, with further development of the projects whose prototypes were developed and presented during the hackathon. For example, one of the projects was Rawest Research’s study on the relationship of Kurdish youth with the Kurdish language. In line with the ideas developed during the hackathon, in fall 2019, a campaign was launched with the slogan ‘Dil Yuvadır’ (Language is Home) as the result of a collaboration with the Rights Initiative Association (HAK İnisiyatifi). The goal of Mor Çatı Women’s Shelter Foundation, an organization engaged in preventing violence against women, was to create an online information system allowing them to provide guidance to women who are victims of violence. The creative team working together with Mor Çatı drew up a visual design based on the foundation’s needs. While some of the hackathon projects have already been brought to life, as shown in the previous examples, others could not be completed due to the experimental and unpredictable nature of the hackathon approach. In any case, it is safe to say that this kind of work, which is rarely practiced in civil society, opened up an exciting space for cooperation between human rights and the creative fields and gave us great motivation for more systematic collaborations in the future.

In the scope of the activities we carried out in 2019 in the field of “Human Rights and Creative Communication,” we brought together human rights defenders and representatives from the creative sector to explore more creative and optimistic ways of communicating human rights.
Taking a brief hiatus from our efforts regarding the cooperation between civil society and the creative fields, we organized a panel titled “The Future of Human Rights Communication” on September 20, 2019. In the first session of the panel, Krizna Gomez and Thomas Coombes talked about the importance of a future-oriented approach and hope-based communication. In her speech entitled “Why Foresight is a Muscle We Should Train,” Krizna Gomez gave an outline of her proposal for a method of futures thinking and explained the importance of the future-oriented system of thinking implied by this method for the human rights movement. According to Krizna, we mostly focus on the past and present when making our strategic plans. However, it is important to include our predictions about the future in our planning in order to be able to adapt to changes.

Thomas Coombes presented the key points of the hope-based approach in human rights communication. Hope, according to Coombes, is a pragmatic strategy drawing from many different disciplines such as history, communication, organization, neurology and cognitive linguistics. In his view, only such a strategy, through which we give voice to our fundemental values and to the lives to which we aspire, will allow us to move from a position of constantly reacting to a position of setting our own agenda. In his presentation, Coombes shared the practical steps of this strategy with us.

In the second session, we discussed the needs of the human rights struggle in terms of communication and creativity with filmmaker Beste Yamalıoğlu, directors Ali Ata Akel and Metin Akdemir, lawyer Idil Aydinoğlu, civil society worker Barış Karasu (IHD), researcher Reha Ruhavioğlu (Rights Initiative) and copywriter Pınar İlkiz (Pikan Agency), all of whom previously collaborated with us in the “Human Rights and Creative Communication” project.

On September 21, immediately after the panel, we held a workshop with Krizna Gomez and Thomas Coombes which brought together approximately 20 people working in NGOs pursuing rights-based agendas. The workshop aimed to empower participants to construct persuasive new narratives for their target audience.

The workshop emphasized the importance for institutions of defining the values they defend and the change they dream of seeing, rather than simply following a communication strategy based on instinct. After we have defined our own values, the next step is to determine the most effective way of getting them across to society. At this point, according to Coombes and Gomez, it is necessary to understand the sets of values of our target audience and to make use of the fields of cognitive science and psychology. Because the alarmist discourses, to which we also contribute from time to time, may lead people to withdraw from politics rather than encouraging them to act. Based on these observations, the participants engaged in practical exercises to construct positive narratives targeting their audiences through values and emotions, and to model values, behaviors and ideas that can form the basis of their communication activities.

This event brought to an end the period covered by this report, following a year of activities aimed at bringing together experts focusing on new approaches in the field of communication and employees of civil society organizations working with a rights-based approach.
Hafıza Merkezi, has been trying to rethink human rights campaigning for some time. For this reason, we do our best to learn about current approaches to campaign development and to further build our capacities in this area.

In October, we organized a workshop on campaigning within the scope of the project “Increasing the Role and Protection of Human Rights Defenders in Turkey” that we carry out in partnership with the Association for Monitoring Equal Rights and with the support of the Netherlands Helsinki Committee.

HOW DID SUCH A NEED ARISE?

In recent times, many rights defenders have been complaining about one particular issue: “We are talking to ourselves”, “We are stuck in an echo chamber.” In the face of polarization and criminalization, we are being forced to act with what Jonathan Haidt, in his TED talk, calls a ‘team psychology’ that groups us with ever more likeminded people. We have to admit that there is something about such an environment that renders us blind to other realities, and this is a bubble from which it can be hard to escape.

One of the motivations for this workshop was to seek ways out together.

Another effect of the prevalent oppressive environment is that those involved in the struggle for rights slide into a reactive position. From the raid on Büyükada Island to the Gezi Trial, which serves as the pretext to hold Osman Kavala prisoner, we have had to respond quickly to every step taken by the government to suppress the struggle for rights. Things kept happening and we were merely reacting. Our public communication has become limited to press releases and Twitter campaigns. Therefore, another motivation of this workshop was to devise a method allowing us to overcome this predicament through greater imagination and hope.

The content of the workshop program, which was prepared and facilitated by Kerem Çiftçioglu from Hafıza Merkezi and Pınar İlkiz from Pikan Agency, was developed based on these needs.

TRACING POLITICAL OPTIMISM...

We adopted an approach based on various practices, where the civil society representatives who came together for this workshop could work in groups. In this, we benefited from Thomas Coombes’s Hope-Based Communication and the Campaign Accelarator developed by the Mobilization Lab. We tried to adapt the hope-based approach to our method not with naive optimism, but as a political strategy. In light of these approaches, we went through the methodical steps of a campaign building process.

Because we believe in learning by doing, we chose issues of current importance to the participants for the case studies. All of the participants were members of the Solidarity Network for Human Rights Defenders, and we therefore made the subject of human rights defenders the main theme of our workshop. In the course of the program, we first tried to understand the case at hand before we moved on to generating and developing ideas about the subject. We divided this process into five pillars that we considered to be important in campaign development:

1) Determining a starting point and a vision,
2) Understanding the problem and the dominant narratives,
3) Determining the target audience and values,
4) Finding and developing campaign ideas,
5) Effective presentation and persuasion.

Our activities’ potential to generate hope is becoming increasingly important in a climate where those in power are trying to narrow the horizons of the struggle for rights. We hope that this workshop and similar projects we are planning to run in the future will contribute to the development of capacities in this area and to the debate on a new form of human rights communication.
Like the campaigning workshop, these panels took place with the aim of increasing the role and protection of human rights defenders in Turkey. With these panels, we sought to adopt a global perspective in discussing the obstacles to and possibilities of the human rights struggle under the current conditions of an erosion of democratic/civic spaces and the major changes brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic. In this regard, we wanted to learn about the experiences in different countries and to compare them with our own. In line with this comparative perspective, each panel brought together one rights defender from Turkey with a rights defender from another country.

We began our series with an outline of the conceptual basis regarding civic spaces, authoritarianization, and populism, and an optimistic perspective on expanding civic spaces. In the following panels, we visited different topics of importance for the struggle for rights that offer good opportunities for fruitful comparison. Therefore, the second panel focused on digital rights in Turkey and Pakistan, the third on LGBTI+ rights in Turkey and Poland, and the fourth on cities and participation in Turkey and Brazil.

In the comparisons we made throughout the series, our overarching questions concerned the respective countries’ experiences in terms of the character of populist and authoritarian politics, the methods used to target civic spaces, and outstanding examples of methods and approaches adopted in civic spaces to fight against this wave of repression.
Both technological developments and the pandemic compelled us to complement our written documentation of the political situation, human rights, and the obstacles faced by rights defenders in Turkey with visual representation and to create a number of short videos. This is how the ShrinkingSpace video series came into being.

For this project, we contacted photo-video journalist Fatih Pınar whose work in video-journalism and activism we had been following closely. For some time already, Pınar has been documenting the unprecedented changes Turkey has been experiencing for a documentary project. For our project, which was supported by the Chrest Foundation, Pınar agreed to give us access to his archive to create short videos that would illustrate what it meant that civic spaces were shrinking in Turkey. The series was launched in July 2020 at the end of Pride Week with the publication of the video ShrinkingSpace # 1: Pride March on Hafıza Merkezi’s Youtube channel.

The first three videos in the series were completed and released in 2020. The video on the Pride March was followed by ShrinkingSpace # 2: Right to Defense and ShrinkingSpace # 3: Women’s Rights. When designing this project, we tried to make sure that the topics would both fit the notion of shrinking civic spaces and also be relevant to Turkey’s agenda at the time of their publication. Completed in time for Pride Week, the Pride March video gave us at Hafıza Merkezi the opportunity to contribute to the 2020 Pride Week, which was celebrated with online events due to pandemic-related restrictions. With over 10 thousand viewers, this video was the most watched video of the series.

While the Right to Defense video was in the making, detained lawyers Ebru Timtik and Aytaç Ünsal were sustaining their hunger strike. At the same time, discussions on new legislation regarding the introduction of a multiple bar system were continuing. The video had a very specific focus and confronted us with a great challenge, as we wanted to convey the different dimensions of how the right to defense had transformed within a changing judicial system. Unfortunately, by the time the video was released, the demands of the lawyers on hunger strike had not been met, and, sadly, Ebru Timtik had lost her life. Thus, the Right to Defense video turned out to be the most difficult to prepare and share, in terms of both its diverse content and its emotional weight.

Although the third video of the series, which deals with Women’s Rights, largely focuses on the 8 March Feminist Night March in terms of the images used, it was released in the last week of November, coinciding with the Night Marches on the evening of November 25, the Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women. The fourth video of the series on freedom of expression is scheduled for released in early 2021.

Besides his own archive, Fatih Pınar also made use of other filmmakers’ archives while preparing his videos. We worked together to decide on people with whom to conduct additional interviews, trying to make sure that the interviewees were people who were involved in the struggles that formed the subject of each video. Our priority was not to provide expert opinions or knowledge, but to reach people who could convey the knowledge and approaches that emerged from the experience of being a part of the struggle.

Although the possibilities for screening the videos at the time of their first release was limited to online channels due to pandemic-related restrictions, we believe that their relevance is not confined to today and that they can be used for advocacy communication in the long term.
At the beginning of 2019, Hafıza Merkezi, in partnership with the Heinrich Böll Stiftung (HBS) and with the financial support of the European Union Delegation to Turkey, initiated the Haklara Destek (‘Support to Rights’) program.

The program offers grants to civil society organizations (CSOs) working with a rights-based approach for a period of one year, between July 2020 and June 2021, together with a mentoring and training program from which organizations will be able to benefit according to their own capacity-building needs.

The main feature distinguishing operational grant support from a project-based grant is that candidate organizations do not have to develop a new project for the application stage. Civil society organizations can apply to the program in order to meet their fixed organizational costs for basic needs, which, despite their essential nature in terms of the organizations’ ability to survive and to carry out ongoing or prospective activities in line with their objectives, are not supported by many grant programs.

The mentoring / training program will be designed to contribute to meeting the needs of CSOs supported by the program as determined by the CSOs’ own self-assessment.

The data related to the working areas and geographical distribution of CSOs in Turkey shows that approximately 40% of the rights organizations in Turkey are located in four cities (Istanbul, Ankara, Izmir and Bursa), while the remaining 60% are distributed across other cities. In order to achieve an adequate geographical distribution in terms of the number of rights-based organizations to be supported within the program, the call for applications was divided into two geographical groups.

Introductory meetings were held in five provinces in order to raise broader awareness of the program and to provide more effective assistance and responses with regard to questions that potential applicant institutions might have while preparing their applications. Representatives of institutions attended meetings in Istanbul, Adana, Ankara, Diyarbakır and Izmir, at which we discussed the details of the program and answered their questions. For institutions that could not attend any of the meetings, a video recording of the meeting held in Istanbul was uploaded to the Hafıza Merkezi YouTube channel as well as to the website of the Haklara Destek program.

A special web-based grant-management system was developed for the program, the application process for which was designed to be completely online. Having experienced the flexibility enabled by completely online-based work during the application and evaluation stages, all communication between the beneficiary institutions and the program team during the program’s implementation was transferred to this system following the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic in early 2020. Thus, while the grant management system was used for needs related to reporting and communication, meetings began to be held online via video conferencing.

The first half of the program was completed by December 2020, by which time we had held two of the three major workshops as well as the financial management and strategic planning workshops, in which all beneficiary institutions were expected to participate. In addition to these major workshops, we held a number of smaller workshops on various topics: impact measurement (eight institutions), working with volunteers (eight institutions), project design and implementation (sixteen institutions), reaching target audiences and enhancing visibility (ten institutions), and developing policy documents (thirteen institutions).
The aim of Keep the Volume Up is to promote human rights defenders who are currently at risk in Turkey and to make visible and document the proceedings and investigations against them as well as the pressure faced by human rights institutions via our project website.
The introduction to our 2017-2018 activity report stated the following observation: “First the media, journalists and academics, and then civil society and human rights advocates, media and political leaders have been put under great pressure through defamation, arbitrary investigations, arrests and trials, legal and financial audits, antidemocratic laws and practices, and a sweeping application of the Anti-Terrorism law.”

Two years later, unfortunately, nothing has changed. In fact, conditions for civil society and human rights defenders have grown even worse. In particular, in Turkey as in other repressive regimes, the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 was instrumentalized to shrink and control civic spaces. While the pandemic made it very difficult to conduct any fieldwork, the government put a ban, both in fact and by decree, on meetings, demonstrations and protests. Meetings of non-governmental organizations had to be postponed. Physicians from the Turkish Medical Association and trade unionists from different confederations who made statements about the state of affairs regarding the pandemic were detained, faced investigations and were put on trial. Rights defenders were targeted from the highest levels of government, arrested and sentenced to imprisonment. The “Bill on Preventing the Proliferation and Financing of Weapons of Mass Destruction” passed by the Turkish Grand National Assembly in the final days of 2020 paved the way for trustees to be appointed to associations by the Ministry of Interior.

Due to all these developments, it is more important than ever to defend rights defenders who are intentionally marginalized and criminalized in the eyes of society, and to share information about their situation with the general public. The aim of Keep the Volume Up, a joint project run since 2018 by Hafıza Merkezi together with the Association for Monitoring Equal Rights and with the support of the Netherlands Helsinki Committee is to promote human rights defenders who are currently at risk in Turkey and to make visible and document the proceedings and investigations against them as well as the pressure faced by human rights institutions via our project website.

The website, whose content is available in both Turkish and English, presents information on rights defenders and rights-based institutions at risk, summaries of relevant legal cases and a calendar of trials. Visitors can also follow recent developments via the news section, and access reference documents, resources and recent reports. Furthermore, information on support programs created for human rights defenders working under difficult conditions is available on the site.

Launched in August 2018, the website contained 50 profiles as of the end of 2020. Some of these profiles belong to individuals, others to institutions, and again others to groups that have come together around a certain area of advocacy and for which they have been criminalized. For example, this includes the Academics for Peace, the Saturday People and the Defenders of the Istanbul Convention. Since it has become a common practice to put rights defenders on trial in large and collective lawsuits, the number of defenders whose struggle we follow through the profiles is close to 1,300.

The creation of the profiles and news content was, and continues to be, based on rights advocacy in the broadest sense of the term. Covering a wide range of fields, from ecology to union organization, from the right to health to the women's movement, and from academics to physicians and lawyers, the site enables its visitors to gain a good understanding of the general situation of the struggle for rights in Turkey and to see how the methods of oppression and the methods of struggle resemble or diverge from each other.

The Keep the Volume Up website presents profiles of rights defenders, who may or may not already be in the public eye, with the aim of raising public awareness and documenting and sharing information on the legal proceedings against them, as well as sharing news about relevant developments. As such, the website is an important resource for journalists, media workers, academics and researchers who want to convey this information to the public. Also available in English, the website is one of the rare resources where international media, researchers and civil society representatives wanting to follow developments in Turkey can find well-curated and detailed information about rights defenders. Approaching the rights system in its broadest sense, the project supports communication between different groups, includes actors involved in different struggles and their target groups and aims to expand the field of human rights.
Hafıza Merkezi started working in the field of peace in 2017 with the project Defending Peace in Difficult Times. The failure of the 2013-2015 peace process and the ensuing conflict made us rethink both our field of work and the requirements of this field. As an institution working to document the severe human rights violations of the past as well as to strengthen the collective memory on these violations and support the legal struggles of those affected by them, we found ourselves amid great devastation as the conflict resumed and we tried to make sense of the situation by comparing it with the '90s, the period we had previously been researching as the “past”. We had major difficulties in carrying out our activities and communicating our work with the wider public. This entire process once again showed us how vital attempts to resolve the Kurdish issue through democratic means are for us. A reckoning with the past and a pursuit of justice regarding past wrongs was directly connected to constructing the present and future as well as to building peace; however, the distress caused by the armed conflict foreclosed any possibility of discussing these issues. Under these circumstances, we concluded that it was essential for us to contribute directly to efforts towards ending the conflict and establishing peace as well as creating new ground for dialogue in the context of the Kurdish issue. This was the environment in which, in 2017, the Defending Peace in Difficult Times project was developed, emerging from the need to better understand what happened during the 2013-2015 peace process and to reflect on peacebuilding in Turkey in light of examples from around the world. The project, which lasted two and a half years, was made up of three main pillars: Carrying out comprehensive research to analyze different positions regarding the peace process by conducting in-depth interviews with people from different social and political backgrounds; compiling the statements and actions of different actors and important events in the peace process in order to prepare a chronology that exhibits the factual basis of the process; organizing working visits that would allow us to gain closer insights into other examples around the world and to use these examples to reflect upon the situation in Turkey.

In the first months of 2019, as we continued working on the research and the chronology, we also made preparations for our third field study in Colombia. The agreement signed between the Colombian government and the FARC in Havana in 2016 ended the 50-year armed conflict between the Colombian state and the FARC, in which 200,000 people lost their lives, and was met with great enthusiasm around the world. In August, during our meetings in Bogota and Cartagena with academics, non-governmental organizations and individuals who personally participated in the peace process, we had the chance to learn about the different political and economic dynamics of the conflict, the challenges faced in the peace process and the current situation. In all of our meetings, concern was expressed that immediately after the peace agreement had been signed, a government came into power whose election campaign had almost exclusively focused on opposing peace. While we were in Colombia, it was reported that armed attacks against community leaders had increased in many regions and that armed criminal gangs had started to form in areas from which the FARC had withdrawn. Our visit to Colombia once again showed us how important it is that the opportunity offered by negotiations for a lasting peace between the conflict parties is carefully woven together with the correct political and social processes.

The research pillar of the Defending Peace in Difficult Times project was based around three different questions: What course did the peace process take and why did it fail? What happened after the process ended? How do different actors imagine peace? Within the scope of the project, we conducted in-depth interviews with 40 people in Istanbul, Ankara and Diyarbakir, including politicians, civil society representatives, business people and journalists. As a result of these interviews and a review of related secondary literature, we prepared three reports, each focusing on one of these three questions. In November 2019, we held a closing meeting attended by our interviewees and our stakeholders working in the field of peace, at which we shared the results of these reports. This meeting gave us the opportunity to both share the outputs of our work and collect comments regarding its content, as well as to realize our goal, which had initially spawned this project, of keeping the discussions on peace alive. In the upcoming period, we plan to continue to disseminate the reports and to talk about peace with different actors, even if it is limited to different focus groups. At the conclusion of the project we had produced three reports offering in-depth analyses of the peace process, established a chronology breaking down the factual basis of the process in detail, and conducted three field visits (to Colombia, Scandinavia and Ireland), and published six short reports in which experts in their respective fields discuss the peace process by focusing on different themes. Defending Peace in Difficult Times has made it possible for us to get to know the field of peace more closely, to establish relationships with many actors that we plan to maintain in the future, and to analyze the peace process in a little more depth, after it ended in such great devastation.

We finished the last report of our project with a sentence frequently repeated by the Women’s Initiative for Peace: “We insist on peace.” We are aware that, at a time when political actors seem light-years away from the idea of peace, this insistence has its limitations. However, as mentioned above, we believe that it is very important both to keep peace on the agenda and to prepare for a potential new peace process. Therefore, taking into account what we learned from the Defending Peace in Difficult Times project, we launched two new projects. The first of these is the Peace Workshop, which we are running together with the Berlin-based Berghof Foundation. We regularly come together with the workshop participants—17 young adults between the ages of 25-35 who have already worked or are willing to work in the field of peace — and organize workshops on various topics such as the basic concepts of peace and conflict resolution, examples of peace processes from around the world, and participatory peacebuilding. Our aim with this project is to increase the participants’ command of the conceptual and practical discussions in the field of peace, to enable them to think together about how they can relate these discussions to their own fields of work and to encourage them to take an active role in the field of peace. We started our meetings, which we had to hold online due to the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic, in May and have held a total of ten workshops so far. Next year, the workshop series will continue, while the participants will also develop their own group projects to discuss the possibilities of peace with different target groups.

Our other project in the field of peace started in March, in partnership with the Stockholm-based Olof Palme International Center. There are three basic pillars to this project: Carrying out comprehensive research about issues whose negotiation is indispensable for the political solution of the Kurdish issue in Turkey; coming together with non-governmental organizations in different provinces to talk about our work in the field of peace and to expand the number of stakeholders in the field; organizing a series of workshops in which the young participants of the peace workshop and institutions working in the field of peace will learn from each other. Due to the unfavorable circumstances created by the COVID-19 pandemic, we decided not to hold the meeting or to organize the other activities within the project that require large amounts of travel this year and are currently only proceeding with the research. In designing the research component of the project, we were inspired by our visit to Colombia, where many people we spoke to, told us that one of the things that had been done correctly in the last peace process was setting a limited negotiation agenda, addressing only issues essential for a political solution. We thought that it would be useful to do some brainstorming on this issue regarding the situation in Turkey and to carry out comprehensive research on certain key issues such as decentralization, transitional justice, and collective rights. Moreover, we believe it to be essential for Turkey’s democratization that these and similar issues that are from time to time discussed in different contexts are addressed in the context of the political and economic inequalities created by the Kurdish issue. The political developments in Turkey following the failure of the peace process have unfortunately been a major blow to any possibility of peace. However, the ideas, discussions and practices of solidarity that have germinated in the spaces opened by the peace process still exist, albeit undercover and in disguise. We are determined to try to reintroduce them to the area of peace and to keep insisting on peace together with actors whose work is motivated by similar aims.
In 2019, as part of the International Week of the Disappeared, we organized two events around Galatasaray Square, which has become the symbol of the struggle regarding enforced disappearances. The first event was the exhibition Aşikâr Sır (Public Secret), where Anıl Olcan’s installation of marble stones imprinted with the pictures of the disappeared was accompanied by works by Asya Leman, Hacer Foggo, Mert Kaya and Hafıza Merkezi. Focusing on grave human rights violations, genocides and war crimes in its work, Hafıza Merkezi has been working on concretely documenting ‘enforced disappearances’ from day one. In our efforts to document and record past disasters, we, like many human rights organizations, make great use of the methodological tools of social sciences and law. On the other hand, we are aware that the acts of witnessing and narrating relate to the visual as much as to words. Sometimes a visual approach allows us to express the truth of the disaster in at least as striking a manner as the written word, if not even more so. For a while now, we have been trying to support our witnessing and narrative efforts with new styles that employ the power of visuality.

The exhibition Aşikâr Sır, which was hosted by Karşı Sanat from May 10-21, 2019, evolved out of an idea that originated in a workshop we held in 2017. In this workshop, people from different disciplines, such as contemporary arts, design and software, came together to reflect on the question: How can we tell the truth of the disappeared? On that day, Anıl Olcan offered the suggestion of printing passport-size representations on marble stones in order to “recall the disappeared to daily life so as to counter enforced disappearance on the existence and presence of its victims.” With this exhibition and the marble monuments, we tried to perpetuate the memory of the disappeared, many of whom are deprived of even the right to burial. Our wish is that this will serve as a remembrance of a state crime committed in the past so that it will not be repeated and we hope that perhaps one day, as a monument, it will be part of a reckoning with the past...

The exhibition included Asya Leman’s video showing Olcan’s marbles in the parts of Istanbul from where the disappeared were initially abducted, a selection of Hacer Foggo’s photographs documenting the struggle surrounding the forcibly disappeared in the ‘90s, 12 of the interviews conducted by Hafıza Merkezi with the relatives of the forcibly disappeared and a video prepared by Mert Kaya about the memory of Galatasaray Square and other public squares, bringing together the views of the Saturday Mothers/People on their protest.

Another event we organized during the Week of the Disappeared was the launch of the book Any Hopes for Truth?, a comparative analysis of enforced disappearances and missing persons in the Caucasus, Middle East and North Africa written by Özgür Sevgi Göral. The event took place on 17 May 2019 at Yapı Kredi Culture Centre. Participants included Göral who represented Hafıza Merkezi and Gülseren Yoleri from the Human Rights Association (Turkey); Nadia Kornioti and Shirin Jetha (Cyprus); Mona Nasseraldin from the Lebanon-based Act for the Disappeared; Shadi Sadr from Justice for Iran, which works on enforced disappearances in Iran; and Tatiana Chernikova on behalf of the Human Rights Center Memorial (Russia). The seeds of the Any Hopes for Truth? publication were sown in 2017 during a regional thematic workshop on the topic of enforced disappearances in countries near Turkey.
Years have passed since the commoners’ graveyard revealed a horror to us. The tortured and mutilated body of Hasan Ocak, the icon of those disappeared in custody, was found buried under a random number in the commoners’ graveyard, as a result of his family’s relentless pursuit. His murderers were present when he was buried, of course. They had dropped his dead body in the Beykoz forest after serving the brown-haired young man a blend of torture that pushed the limits of human imagination and attracted the envy of even the most glorious traditions of torture in history. From the poor records we learned that a member of the public had found him and that his body was passed on to the commoners’ graveyard after forensic medicine had labelled his body as unclaimed. It was as a result of the stubborn efforts of his family, who put up with being pushed around, taken into custody and declared national enemies, that his body was finally traced. The horror expressed by Hasan’s sister and the fragmentary images recorded by a shamefaced camera on television entirely dislocated the reality of the commoners’ graveyard, which had until then been a sad but also somewhat romanticized last stop in our middle-class perception. All of a sudden, the commoners’ graveyard turned into a threat that could devour us all at any moment. It had become the mass grave of a massacre. The majority of those whose identity had been deemed unknown and who had been labelled with random numbers and buried side by side since the early ’90s had not died a natural death. That is, they had been tortured, mutilated, and slaughtered. Hasan was not unclaimed. In finding his corpse, his family was finally freed from the state of crucifying agony in which the families of the thousands of recorded cases of disappeared persons are trapped.

The first example of mass disappearance at the hands of a state is the operation launched on December 7, 1941 by order of Nazi General Wilhelm Keitel. Thousands of insurgents were rounded up and disappeared in the middle of the night to intimidate Nazi-occupied Europe and to suppress all forms of resistance. The operation was called “Night and Fog.” In the poetry of fascism, night and fog meant that disappearances took place in the night, shrouded in the fog of uncertainty.

But as Hannah Arendt underlines, the Nazis’ “efforts to let their ‘opponents disappear in silent anonymity’ were in vain.” For there would always be someone left alive to tell the story.

STONES RESISTING OBLIVION*

*The darkness is not yet unveiled. These stones were dressed thinking about how we can build a new life on the humming void left by those lives that have been covered up and erased as if they had never been lived.
Later, in the ‘60s, thousands of people were disappeared in Guatemala and Brazil. Hundreds were disappeared in Chile after the 1973 coup. Pinochet lent a hand to the Argentine generals. Thousands of dissidents were disappeared in Argentina after the 1976 coup. After the transition to civilian rule, some generals would confess that most of the missing people had been drugged into a stupor and dropped into the ocean from planes.

From 1980 until today, with the ‘90s as a period of particular intensity, the Republic of Turkey too would become notorious for the brutal practice of enforced disappearance. Men who disdained the night often acted in broad daylight as they shoved people into their cars and took them away. Their confidence in the fog was absolute. They obviously thought that they would never have to stand sweating in front of a judge and reveal their methods before any court. Our sinister history has unfortunately proved them right.

Let’s at least confess this: There is no society without memory. There are only societies that dare to sacrifice their children and cling to virtues like poverty, despair and ignorance, cautiously passing over massacres thinking, “let’s not get into trouble.”

Disappearing a person is the end point in the history of torture. It is a cruelty without compare. It means severing the disappeared’s every tie with the world, leaving behind not even the faintest glimmer of hope. Striking that person out of the world’s record. Leaving them all alone. Suffocating those who remain behind, the relatives, with their own hopes. Punishing them with their own hopes. Throwing them into a limbo that gives no respite to any of the emotions they know, or that they are prepared for.

Their loved ones now live on in a world they no longer know. In a world whose customs and rules they do not know. The details of everyday life, all the little things that define day as day and night as night start to hurt. Everything is written in the tense stillness of waiting. All vital actions suspended. No matter how much they give their loved ones up for dead, some part of them, that part believing in miracles, making them human, continues the wait. There was a mother I once spoke to. Even fifteen years later her heart was pounding every time she saw a young man with glasses driving a car. Hanging people to their own hopes and draining them with their own hopes - this is the bloodiest of savagery.

Almost all the relatives of the disappeared I have met said that they had given up hope that their sons, daughters and siblings were alive. In order to remain human. To sit down and have breakfast in the morning. To go and earn money, to take a nap in the evening in front of the TV, to keep the house clean, to visit neighbors. With a hopeless effort, they all said that they were out of hope. In order to survive. To remain human. While talking to them, two lines by Melih Cevdet Anday kept turning in my head like two steel screws: “Our hope was the river that patience could not hold / Our despair was to remain human.”

The Saturday Mothers gathered in Galatasaray for weeks, bludgeoned and beaten in custody. Now they are banned from setting foot there. Now there is no one left to remind us of the disappeared, of whose detention is a known fact, has been witnessed, but is nonetheless denied by the authorities, of those whose bodies, hatefully ripped apart, were thrown into what knows which riverbed, which forest, or which pit. The mothers and fathers who have grown thousands of years older no longer sit in front of Galatasaray High School holding up images of their sons and daughters, mostly enlarged versions of faded passport photographs taken in a rundown photographer’s shop. In their dreams, they perhaps still see their missing children knock on the door one evening, as if nothing had happened. They are the ones who are denied the right to mourn the death of their loved ones, who remain alive knowing that they cannot hold anyone to account. On the other side is a society of people whose losses increase day by day as they feel grateful because none of their relatives have been disappeared.

The darkness is not yet unveiled. These stones were dressed thinking about how we can build a new life on the humming void left by those lives that have been covered up and erased as if they had never been lived; thinking about how we can make our life from this emptiness without succumbing to the sluggishness of hope. These are stones resisting oblivion. Stones that say, we remember, we know, and we will call you to account.

Introduction text that was published in the Aşikar Sır exhibition catalogue.
“Which terminal are we headed for, domestic or international? We can enter simply with our IDs, can’t we? Do not let them put a stamp in your passport, you won’t be able to enter Greece! Can we use our normal phone numbers? So those who have a Schengen visa can’t cross to the south either? ...”

Confused by the questions posed by a divided island, we were traveling to a country that is not recognized as such anywhere in the world except for Turkey. These questions showed us that we, as people from Turkey, were considered an immediate party to the conflict. For some, we were citizens of the occupying state. That is why we were afraid that we might not be able to go to the South, that we might not be able to go to Greece when we entered Nicosia. However, we weren’t going to Turkey, but to Cyprus, an island with its own historical and geographical unity.

Cyprus, where these everyday questions and problems have their roots, was and is shaped by a conflict that has unraveled at both international and local level. How did one confront the destruction and violations caused by this conflict in the country? We had set off with the aim of contributing to building new relations and bridges between the struggles for truth in Turkey and Cyprus. We were particularly aware of the progress and achievements in the struggle for truth regarding the disappeared and wanted to meet the people and institutions leading this struggle. However, the criticism we witnessed once we arrived went beyond our expectations. The conflict in Cyprus had caused so many casualties on both sides that it was impossible to ignore the pervasive impact of this issue on the whole of society. But whereas the “victimization” caused by disappearances was something acknowledged both by the states and the Cypriot society, the fact that disappearances constitute a crime and therefore come with a perpetrator is being swept under the rug. We once again saw how the success of the Committee on Missing Persons in Cyprus in finding the missing persons in Cyprus and delivering their bodies to their families obfuscated the unfulfilled demand for justice of the relatives of the disappeared.
MISSING PERSONS AND ENFORCED DISAPPEARANCE

Enforced disappearance is a crime that describes situations where a person is abducted or detained by the state together with the state’s refusal to acknowledge this fact or to provide information about the fate of that person. Missing persons, on the other hand, according to the most general definition, is a term used for persons who cannot be found for different reasons that do not imply direct involvement of the state. A missing person can be lost as a result of armed conflict, of migrating from one country to another, or of a natural disaster. Missing persons do not have to be lost as a result of an incident that constitutes a crime and points to the responsibility of the state. of enforced disappearances in countries such as Russia, Armenia-Azerbaijan-Georgia, Iran, Lebanon, Turkey, Cyprus and Algeria. The idea for this report arose at a workshop one year earlier, in 2017, when different institutions working on disappearances in these countries came together in Istanbul on the invitation of Hafıza Merkezi. Our visit to Cyprus is part of this effort to understand and cooperate.

Journalist Sevgül Uludağ’s [2] efforts were crucial in bringing the issue of the disappeared to light for the first time in Cyprus. When we met families of the disappeared from both communities in Nicosia, it was persistently emphasized how important Uludağ’s efforts were in revealing and bringing up the issue of the disappeared. The changing dynamics of bi-communal life in Cyprus were another important factor in the course of this process. Prior to 1963, the communities had coexisted on the island, but the conflict eroded their bonds, and between 1974 and 2003 the two communities were unable to find a way back to each other. The situation began to change with the controlled opening of the borders in 2003. Uludağ, who was unaware of these enforced disappearances during her first years in the profession, says that it was in such an environment that she first learned about the issue by chance. Together with a group of relatives of the missing from both communities, Uludağ began collecting the stories of the disappeared. The fact that both sides are affected by this experience enables the communities to develop mutual empathy and to acknowledge that both are victims. The opening of the border in 2003 allowed the two communities to come together more frequently, leading the relatives of the missing to become officially organized in 2006. Today, families of the missing from the two communities are joined together in the organization Together We Can.

During our visit, it was particularly important to us to spend time with the families of the missing. In this context, we first had a small meeting with Erbay Akansoy and his father Hüseyin Akansoy [3], Sevgül Uludağ, and Christos Efthymiou [4], all of whom are leading figures in Together We Can and who helped us greatly with the preparation of our program. In this meeting, Efthymiou told us that previously it was only the Greek side that had paid any attention to the issue of the disappeared, and then only in the context of disappeared persons of Greek origin. On the Turkish side, on the other hand, the disappeared were not called “missing” but referred to as “martyrs”. After this small meeting, we held a closed meeting which was attended by many Cypriot relatives of the disappeared. Presentations on the issue of the disappeared in Turkey and Cyprus were made at the meeting. The exchange of stories between Hanım Tosun, the wife of Fehmi Tosun who was disappeared in 1995, and the Cypriot families left the strongest emotional mark on all of us. It was both painful and empowering to hear about the devastation enforced disappearances caused among those left behind, how the relatives of the disappeared survived this painful experience and how resolutely they continued their struggle.

Going to Cyprus, we were excited to meet the team at the Committee on Missing Persons (CMP) and to see its work on site. We had assumed that the relatives of the disappeared would look favorably upon the work of the CMP. However, as much as the importance of the CMP was underlined during our two-day visit, we heard significant criticisms regarding its work.

One of the main criticisms directed at the CMP was that its activities were structured in a way that did not allow for any discussion about perpetrators. Established by a group of lawyers to advocate accountability mechanisms regarding those responsible for the disappeared, Truth Now is an organization that puts precisely this issue at the heart of its work. The CMP does not make any explanation as to the sources from which it obtains its information; this is used to encourage those responsible for the disappearances to testify, but is considered a de facto amnesty for the perpetrators. Although Truth Now requested information on whether there were perpetrators among those who testified to the CMP, it received no response to these requests for reasons of confidentiality. In fact, Truth Now does not request information concerning people’s identities, but would like to know whether the information comes from the perpetrators, in order to gauge whether the practice of de facto amnesties is an effective approach. Truth Now pointed to the limitations of the CMP’s terms of reference and developed a proposal on how they could be revised. [5] Although by offering a broader definition of the truths uncovered by the committee, their proposal does not cover jurisdiction over the issue, it does recommend investigations be carried out into how the disappearance occurred and therefore does not exclude the possibility of legal proceedings.

Another obstacle to taking legal action regarding the disappearances is the island’s divided structure. An indication of this became visible when some perpetrators recently made statements to the newspapers. Often, they are able to make these statements because since there is no definition of a crime, they believe there will not be any trials in this regard, and they feel a certain pride about what they have done. Prosecutors on both sides do not initiate any investigations about these statements on the grounds that they do not fall under their jurisdiction.

Of course, these criticisms are not meant to underestimate the importance of finding the bodies of the disappeared, especially for their families. With the permission of the CMP and accompanied by an officer working in the committee, we visited an excavation site in Nicosia. Not knowing what we would encounter, we felt a slight sense of apprehension as we headed towards the site, and when we arrived we found that the excavation was taking place in a small street in the heart of the city, where daily life continued as normal. In order not to cause any disturbances in the street, only small areas were dug and immediately closed over again after the body parts of the disappeared had been disinterred. The excavation team consisted of Cypriots from both communities and the excavations were carried out with great care. Accustomed to the careless excavations carried out in Turkey, we were impressed to see such precision and diligence – qualities that are essential for such work. During our interview with the excavation team leader, we were also struck by the fact that the team’s scrupulous approach to the technical aspects of the excavations was also complemented by great sensitivity regarding the feelings of the relatives of the disappeared. Cyprus is a small place; almost everyone here knows someone who is missing. This shows just how widespread the crime of enforced disappearances was on the island, as well as the extent of its emotional impact on those who live here. Therefore, the team involved in the excavations carried out its work with a level of care that goes beyond mere professionalism.

We held almost all our Cyprus meetings in the Home for Cooperation. When the border was opened for crossing in 2003, a group of peace activists led the way to the establishment of this community center established on the green line in the buffer zone in the heart of Nicosia. The building, which hosts the offices of different non-governmental organizations, is both a cafe and a cultural center, as well as a working area where people from the north and south can come together, collaborate and develop joint projects. The center also houses the office of the Cyprus Dialogue Forum, where Erbay Akansoy, who greatly supported us in creating the program for our visit, works. At this point, we need to make a brief aside for the Cypriot element of our team. We can honestly say that this program would not have been possible without Erbay, who supported us at every moment from the preparatory stages to our two-day stay on the island. We are also grateful to Maria Zeniou and Başak Ekenoğlu from the Cyprus Dialogue Forum for readily responding to our every need.

By the time we left Cyprus, we had found answers to some of the questions in our minds and learned a lot of new information about the history and everyday politics of the island. However, this visit also raised new questions: How can the tension between truth and justice—a tension that we also see in various other contexts—be resolved? Could the complexity and coexistence of the positions of perpetrators and victims make it easier to recognize a “common pain”? What can the fact that the relatives of the disappeared of both communities stand side by side tell us for the struggle in Turkey, or, can it tell us anything at all? Can the attitude and policy of the Turkish state in Cyprus somehow be considered in conjunction with its attitude and policy on the bringing about of a solution to the Kurdish issue? Can this comparison be utilized to strengthen our demand for peace? And of course, in addition to all these questions, we left Cyprus deeply affected by everyone we met there, their personal stories and their determined struggle.

Memorialize Turkey highlights examples of memorialization among the many groups and individuals that have been harmed by grave human rights violations over the past 100 years, from the late Ottoman Empire and the foundation of the Republic of Turkey until today. The project started in 2013 as a collaboration between the World Policy Institute, the Fetzer Institute, and Hafıza Merkezi. The initial project idea was suggested by Belinda Cooper from the World Policy Institute during a workshop organized by Hafıza Merkezi in December 2011. The aim was to compile different actors' memorialization efforts in order to contribute to the democratization of the field of memory in Turkey, which is dominated by an exclusive, nationalist and one-dimensional national memory.

After the initial workshop, we organized a follow-up workshop in Mardin in February 2013 which brought together participants from various political initiatives in Turkey, who represented different ethnic and religious identities and were actively working in memorialization. We also invited civil society representatives with experience in memorialization work from Germany, Israel, and Bosnia, three countries trying to deal with difficult and contested histories. The product of our joint efforts was the website Memorialize Turkey.

The website's first version, published in 2013, featured 26 examples of memorialization addressing past atrocities that are being denied, repressed, or misinterpreted today. These mostly included physical memorials and rather typical forms of memorialization, such as statues, shrines, parks, monuments and former prisons. In the following years, Hafıza Merkezi started to engage in connecting memorialization work with new technologies and creative methods. We organized public panels on the role of new mediums, such as gaming and virtual reality, in confronting grave human rights violations. We continue our efforts towards enhancing the creative and narrative capacities in the field of human rights by actively encouraging collaborations between human rights organizations and the creative disciplines. Thus, in 2018-2019, our approach to memorialization became more diversified. In this context, we decided to update the Memorialize Turkey website. To highlight our shifting focus on the landscape of memory, we added 12 new cases to the site in 2019, bringing the site to where it is today, providing information about 37 memorialization projects.

The following memorialization projects were added to the updated version of the site: The books Being a Queer in the ‘80s and Being a Queer in the ‘90s; The Monument Counter: A Digital Memorial for Women Killed by Violence; bak.ma: Digital Media Archive of Political Movements, Curious Steps: Gender and Memory Walks of Istanbul; Peace Portraits: A Look at the Lives We Lost on October 10, 2015; Hafıza Kaydı: In Search of Mutual Stories; Karakutu Memory Walks; Kavil: In the Ruins; Turkey Cultural Heritage Map; Hope Archive; 23,5 Hrant Dink Site of Memory; Conscience and Justice Watch.

In the struggle for truth, justice and memory, it is of paramount importance to include wider segments of society in the process of learning from past mistakes so as to make the motto ‘Never Again!’ a reality. Many of the different memorialization projects listed on this site can be seen as practices of dealing with a painful past in the form of digital, permanent or periodic works. We hope that this site, designed to offer a compilation of such practices, will contribute to an important discussion on how commemorative activities can help us to be curious about, understand and question human rights and past injustices.
More recently, we have been developing and conducting projects aimed at bringing together the field of art and the human rights movement in Turkey, a country whose social memory has frequently been disrupted by those in power. It was in this context that we launched our project Memory and Art in Turkey in order to examine and discuss the reflections of social memory in art.

Within this scope, we first of all wanted to review artworks created between 2000-2019 that dealt with social memory in the context of human rights and had been exhibited in Turkey, in order to assemble a selection. After this initial selection process, we planned to organize a public talk and to publish a book on this research, and to open up spaces where civil society, academia and the arts could come together to discuss these issues. In bringing together people working in the fields of social memory, the struggle for rights and art within such an overarching framework, our aim is to encourage these fields to draw from one another, thus allowing them to create a new language. We further aim to contribute to investigating opportunities for creative debate and to make artworks dealing with memory more visible to different audiences. At the same time, we hope to contribute to a reinterpretation of the social, political and artistic contexts in which the works of art were produced or which form the subject of the works and to facilitate a better understanding of the impacts of the systematic and ongoing rights violations in Turkey on our collective memory. After starting our research towards the end of 2018, 2020 was devoted to the compilation of the artworks and the public talks. The project will conclude with the publication of a book featuring the outcomes of our work in the early months of 2021.
In the first phase of the research, the research team, made up of Ayşe İdil, Eylem Ertürk and Sevim Sancaktar, reviewed artworks produced over a 20-year period. Since many institutions do not currently have an archive, we drew up a list of 40 institutions, venues, festivals and initiatives and went through the contents of the artworks that had been part of all the exhibitions and shows organized by these institutions since 2000. While the websites, printed brochures and catalogues of biennials, museums, festivals, performance venues, galleries and art initiatives constituted our main sources, articles published in magazines and different publications or information obtained from one-on-one interviews were included in the selection as secondary sources. After reviewing 1,670 exhibitions and screenings from a total of 40 institutions/initiatives, we prepared a list of over 400 artworks that matched our framework.

In the second step, in order to gain a better understanding of the relationship and interactions between art and social memory in parallel with the transformation that Turkey has undergone over the last 20 years, we opened the selection to interpretations. We invited 15 people from civil society, the arts and academia and between September-December 2020, we split into five different study groups to examine and evaluate the selection under certain themes, discussing different possibilities regarding their interpretation.

The third stage of the project, which was supported by the Chrest Foundation, was a series of public talks. Here, each speaker made a presentation based on our previous discussions in the study groups. The talks, which were held from 16-25 December, took place online due to the pandemic. The presentations delivered in these sessions will be collected in a book to be published in March 2021.

TALKING ABOUT PUBLIC SECRETS IN THE SEARCH FOR JUSTICE

The scope of Hafıza Merkezi’s monitoring activities, which began with cases concerning the widespread and systematic extrajudicial executions and enforced disappearances with the involvement of state officials in the 1990s, has expanded over the last two years.

Hafıza Merkezi is compiling the information gathered in the course of its monitoring of criminal proceedings regarding serious human rights violations in the recent past in a digital archive entitled Faili Belli. This online archive, a product in particular of the legal studies pursued at Hafıza Merkezi, contains publicly available background information on the trials, a curated compilation of related news, monitoring reports, analyses as well as translated articles and legal resources. The scope of Hafıza Merkezi’s monitoring activities, which began with cases concerning the widespread and systematic extrajudicial executions and enforced disappearances with the involvement of state officials in the 1990s, has expanded over the last two years.

The judicial proceedings regarding the violations of the right to life arising from the disproportionate use of lethal force by security forces in the 2000s were included in the trial monitoring. failibelli.org started to cover a number of critical lawsuits filed with respect to deaths caused by such use of force during gatherings and demonstrations or in daily life, especially in conflict zones. Monitoring the conduct of the judiciary regarding similar violations that occurred in two different periods allows us to understand and expose how perpetrators continue to be protected from criminal responsibility by a shield of impunity.

The existence of the JITEM (“Gendarmerie Intelligence and Counter-Terrorism”) unit was denied for many years in Turkey. Finally, a new dynamic unfolded under the guise of confronting with the past. This period saw the initiation of different criminal proceedings including the Ergenekon trials. The government acknowledged the existence of JITEM and, as in the Kızıltepe JITEM case, indictments containing detailed information about the organizational structure of JITEM, its position in the state and its illegal activities were admitted by the courts and prosecution began. The resumption of investigations that had been deferred for years and legal actions pursued on the basis of “promising” indictments gave rise to expectations that justice could finally prevail for the relatives of the victims.

By 2018, four of the cases which had been expected to create the basis for a reckoning with the past had resulted in acquittal, and pessimism regarding the ongoing cases started to grow. Together with the network Alliance in the Fight Against Impunity, of which we are a member, Hafıza Merkezi organized a series of conversations, asking: If JITEM exists but does not seem to play a role in the grave human rights violations, then who committed these violations?

THE EXISTENCE OF JITEM IN THE ’90S AND TRIALS

The first conversation took place after the Kızıltepe JITEM trial ended with impunity on September 9, 2019, with the participation of attorneys Erdal Kuzu from the Mardin Bar Association and Nuray Özdoğan from the Ankara Bar Association as well as journalists Irfan Aktan and Gökçer Tahincioğlu. At the Ankara Bar Association Training Center, the Kızıltepe JITEM case was discussed in all its aspects.

THE EXISTENCE OF JITEM IN THE ’90S AND THE SEARCH FOR JUSTICE

In this conversation hosted by the Alumni Association of the Faculty of Political Science of Ankara University on 20 September 2019, journalist Gökçer Tahincioğlu was accompanied by his colleague Ayşegül Doğan in moderating a conversation between lawyers Eren Baskın, Sertaç Ekinci, Selim Okçuoğlu and Yunus Muratakan.

DISAPPEARANCE AND STRUGGLE: SEARCHING FOR JUSTICE

The panel that took place in the Mültiye Cultural Center on 13 December 2019, before the final hearing of the Ankara JITEM trial, included speakers from the relatives of the disappeared. The first session was moderated by journalist Ayça Söylemez and joined by Begüm Erdoğan and Leyla Yildirim, while the second session was moderated by Filiz Gazi with Rahşan Anter, Eren Aysan, Alaz Erdost and Zeynep Altook taking the floor.

In coming together to discuss the difficulties of the search for justice, our aim was to strengthen the courage and solidarity created by this struggle.

AS CASES CONFRONTING THE PAST ARE CLOSED:
WHO ARE THE PERPETRATORS (#PEKIFAILKIM)?

We took Human Rights Week (December 10-17) as an occasion to take stock of the small number of cases opened regarding this period that requires urgent confrontation in Turkey.
Extrajudicial killings and enforced disappearances of civilians occurred as a systematic state policy in Turkey in the 1990s. In recent years, the few lawsuits on this issue, which offered the possibility of a reckoning with this state policy, have one-by-one come to a close with no convictions. In such a political context, we took Human Rights Week on December 10-17 as an occasion to take stock of the small number of cases opened regarding this period of the country’s history that requires urgent confrontation. Every year, December 10, the date of the United Nations’ adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, is celebrated as Human Rights Day. Together with other rights defenders in Turkey, we too organize various activities on this date and throughout the week in order to raise the visibility of our work. In 2019, therefore, we prepared an infographic that brings together information about twelve cases of gross human rights violations committed in the 1990s which we are monitoring on Faili Belli, our monitoring website for human rights cases.

Until fairly recently, indictments were being drafted against the perpetrators who stood accused in these cases, with prosecutors demanding heavy prison sentences. Today, these cases are being closed with acquittals, on the grounds of lack of evidence. But is there really a lack of evidence? A glance at the indictments suggests the opposite to be true. These indictments contain very detailed descriptions of the organizational structure of the Gendarmerie Intelligence and Counterterrorism Unit (JITEM), which is presented as the perpetrator of the crimes, and about how these crimes were committed. In other words, there is no lack of evidence.

With our infographic, we present an account of the judicial processes that opened up the possibility to confront the dark crimes of the past, but in fact never fulfilled this promise. The study presents critical turning points in these 12 cases that we have been monitoring in conjunction with important political developments in Turkey.

Observing that commanding officers who were being charged with serious crimes are now being acquitted one by one, we, as families and human rights defenders in search of justice, ask the following fitting question: If there is a lack of evidence, then who are the perpetrators (#PekiFaiKim)?
The member states of the Council of Europe (CoE) and the states that are contracting parties to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) have an obligation to comply with judgments of the ECtHR that find a violation of the Convention. (ECHR, Art. 46)

In this context, the CoE Committee of Ministers (Committee), which consists of government representatives of the 47 member states of the CoE, is the body authorized and assigned to supervise the execution of ECtHR judgments. (In accordance with ECHR, Art. 46 and 39/4; Rules of Court, Art. 43)

The Committee holds large Human Rights Meetings in March, June and September, where it evaluates developments regarding the execution of the judgments under supervision. It further evaluates the action plans indicated by the contracting parties with respect to the court judgments under supervision and sets out its recommendations, instructions or concerns through decisions/interim resolutions. These meetings are closed, it is not possible for the injured parties who submitted the application or for NGOs to attend them.

Therefore, in order to prevent the Committee from basing its evaluations during the supervision process only on the action plans and statements of the states, mechanisms have been established to ensure that NGOs, injured parties and their legal advisors participate in the Committee’s judgment execution procedure and that the ECtHR judgments are implemented in a timely and effective manner. One of these mechanisms is the submission under Rule 9.2.

Pursuant to Rule 9 of the Rules of the Committee of Ministers, injured parties (as per Rule 9.1) and NGOs (as per Rule 9.2) can submit communications to the Committee, presenting their evaluations and recommendations regarding the judgment under supervision in order to assist the execution process.

What is the importance of Rule 9.2? (Its impact)
When it comes to human rights violations, we mostly assume that everyone knows everything about other countries, but this is not really the case or how the system works. If not backed by specific information and analytical studies, general discourses are not really useful in the legal field. For this reason, it is extremely important for NGOs to be involved in the supervision processes of the ECtHR judgments and to provide the Committee with reliable and tangible information.

If the NGO and the injured parties are unable to present an opinion during the execution of the ECtHR's judgments, then first of all, the Committee, during its evaluations, only listens to the one-sided point of view of the state. Especially in countries like Turkey, Azerbaijan, Russia, and Ukraine that are reluctant to execute ECtHR judgments fully and in due time, civil society holds an even greater responsibility in this regard.

The second important aspect is related to involvement in the processes regarding individual and general measures to be taken by states to remedy a violation and prevent similar violations from recurring. As mentioned at the beginning, according to the ECHR, member states are under a legal obligation to remedy violations found by the ECtHR. In practice, this obligation is fulfilled in two ways: Individual measures specific to the injured applicant, and general measures. The aim of individual measures is to provide full remedy. This may include the payment of compensation to the applicant in order to remedy material or moral damages in the context of just satisfaction, the reopening of unfair criminal proceedings, the restoration of assets, the implementation of domestic court decisions, the release of unjustly detained persons, the reinstatement of dismissed persons, etc.

General measures, on the other hand, aim for states to develop policies, judicial practices or legislative arrangements to prevent the possibility of causing similar violations in the future. In this regard, non-governmental organizations, by means of their Rule 9.2 submissions, have the opportunity to influence state policies through the recommendations of the Committee. For this reason, it is extremely important for them to present evaluations on the state's action plans and similar issues, to intervene in order for human rights policies to be developed, and to have an impact on the recommendations and requests to be directed to the state by the Committee.

Why did we need to make submissions under Rule 9.2? (Closing of the Aksoy group and our EIN membership)
We know that Turkey does not put into practice the individual and general measures or the recommendations of the Committee concerning the majority of ECtHR judgments. Given this state of affairs, we decided to present a Rule 9.2 submission regarding the Aksoy case group, in which judgments under supervision related to the enforced disappearances of the 1990s, one of Hafıza Merkezi's working areas, were particularly concentrated.

Within the scope of “Actions of Security Forces in Turkey,” the Committee supervised the relevant judgments under four groups of cases: Aksoy, Batı and others, Erdoğan and others and Kasa.

In the Aksoy group (standard supervision), there are 175 judgments in which the ECtHR found that the Convention had been violated due to deaths caused by the excessive use of force by members of the security forces, inadequate protection of the right to life, deaths and/or disappearances, ill-treatment, damage to property, and the lack of an effective domestic remedy. 42 of these judgments concern enforced disappearances allegedly committed by security forces.

The execution of several relatively recent judgments was supervised under the Battı and others group of cases (two out of 68 cases). The Erdoğan and others group of cases (six out of nine cases) and the Kasa group of cases (one out of seven cases), which also included some cases concerning enforced disappearances, were supervised under an enhanced supervision procedure.

We prepared a detailed monitoring report containing recommendations to the Committee on the execution process of the ECtHR’s judgments in the Aksoy, Battı and others, Erdoğan and others and Kasa groups that concerned enforced disappearances. Unfortunately, we were unable to influence the outcome. A number of cases in the Aksoy group still pending in Turkey were transferred to the Mahmut Kaya group and the problem headings under the Aksoy group were closed. The headings that were closed included: The inadequate and ineffective legal framework for providing procedural safeguards in police custody; the failure to protect the lives of the applicants’ relatives; the general attitudes and practices of members of the security forces, problems regarding their education and training systems, and the inadequacy of the legal framework regarding their activities; ensuring direct effect of the ECHR requirements on domestic law; prompt and efficient implementation of the Law on Compensation of the Losses Resulting from Terrorism and from the Measures taken against Terrorism in the context of inadequacies with respect to providing remedy to injured parties; as well as the training of judges and prosecutors.

The closing of these headings meant that Turkey was taking satisfactory steps with respect to the above-mentioned problems remarked in the judgments under the Aksoy group and that the Committee would therefore stop supervising the cases under these headings.

There is of course a lot to be criticized about this decision and therefore we continue to submit 9.2 reports on other relevant groups of cases to the best of our abilities. In our more recent monitoring reports, we draw attention to the current problems with respect to the closed headings that, despite reforms, continue in new forms and by different means and set out our recommendations regarding the supervision that is to be carried out by the Committee.

Hafıza Merkezi is a member of the European Implementation Network (EIN), which works in the context of the implementation of the ECtHR judgments in these processes. We received great support from the network in preparing our submissions.

What was our experience? (The importance of documentation and following the process from the beginning, the interim resolution to be adopted in the Battı and others group)

Work in this area requires long-term engagement in gathering information and documents and an analytical evaluation and processing of documents in the context of legal standards. Relentless continuation of the struggle and the creation of alliances unquestionably make a difference over time. For example, together with the Human Rights Foundation of Turkey (TIHV) and the Human Rights Association (IHD) and with the support of the EIN, we made Rule 9.2 submissions regarding the supervision of the judgments in the Battı and others group over the past two years. Reviewing these submissions and the CPT reports, the Committee decided that Turkey should take result-oriented steps with respect to the problems indicated in our submission and that supervision of the group of cases should be resumed.

What can NGOs do in this context?

The ECtHR’s judgments include more or less detailed determinations and instructions as to how detected violations should be corrected. In addition, as the number of judgments under supervision increases, the Committee groups similar cases in order to observe the “systematic and structural” problems indicated by them. In this way, it is possible to supervise the execution processes of the judgments along the lines of necessary regulations and general reforms. If each institution can utilize these supervision headings according to its own field of work and make Rule 9.2 submissions based on documentation and analytical work, this can make a tremendous difference over time in terms of demonstrating to the Committee legislation- and implementation-related problems in the field of human rights.
In Turkey, debates on transitional justice gained momentum in academia and civil society in the light of critical judicial and political developments that took place in the 2000s. The opening of high profile criminal cases and the revival of investigations after 2008 gave rise to cautious hopes that it would be possible to break the shield of impunity and cast light upon the denied truths. In 2015, the country entered a period of conflict that was characterized by a further escalation of violence, and in 2016, in the repressive environment that prevailed in the aftermath of the coup attempt of 15 July 2016, civic spaces were seriously curtailed, leaving no space for the exercise of freedom of expression. Furthermore, a regime change that included important transformations in the judiciary took place. Taken together, these developments weakened and almost suppressed debates on transitional justice. The crisis of democracy which we are currently witnessing on a global scale and which is being discussed in the context of debates on ‘rising authoritarianism, nationalism and right-wing extremism’ and the ‘post-truth’ era became even more pronounced under the conditions created by the COVID-19 pandemic. As we have seen in the case of the novel and powerful forms of agency that oppose state violence, institutional racism, and impunity, this process has been accompanied by new dynamics that lead us to think through the notions of justice and truth.

Just as those exposed to violence in the course of repression and conflict are not a homogeneous or passive group of individual victims of one particular injustice, the reach of violence is not limited to these people either. Violence is closely related to deep structural inequalities and forms of social exclusion, and the state, by violating its negative and positive obligations, is responsible for it. Therefore, we wanted to consider not only forms of violence directly perpetrated by state officials, but also those forms which the state reinforces or condones by not fulfilling its obligations, as well as the practices of social struggle which are employed to counter these forms of violence. In fact, the transition to a situation where the perpetrators of violence no longer enjoy impunity cannot be achieved without examining these institutionalized power relations from an intersectional perspective that includes legal, semi-legal and extra-legal practices of struggle that are shaped by social movements and cannot be substituted for one another.

From such a vantage point we organized a symposium through which we aimed to approach the field of transitional justice from a broad perspective in order to discuss it within an interdisciplinary and critical framework that includes the experiences, practices and demands for justice of the different groups who are fighting against violence in Turkey.

The symposium “Transitional Justice in Turkey: Transforming Subjects, Methods and Instruments” took place on 27-29 November 2020 and was joined by academics from different disciplines, graduate and doctoral students, independent researchers, rights defenders, activists, and NGO employees. We are planning to publish the papers presented at the symposium as an edited book in 2021.
